

BREAKING ⌚ 5m

⌚ 3h

⌚ 1h

Boris Johnson tells Tory MPs 'I will lead you to ...

Boris Johnson in 11th hour plea to MPs ahead o...

All London underground lines affected by maj...

CULTURE › EXHIBITIONS

Radio Ballads at Serpentine North Gallery review: a show that affirms the transformative power of art

The show, featuring multiple films and video installations from four artists, takes a few hours to see - but it's really worth the time investment

Evening  Standard

Ilona Sagar, The Body Blow, 2022 from Radio Ballads at the Serpentine / Photo: George Darrell

By Ben Luke | 31 March 2022

Review at a glance

The last time I went to the Serpentine North, for the KAWS show in January, I felt gloomy about a prominent institution opening itself up to a deluge of terrible art. This time, I left the same venue feeling moved and uplifted. While Radio Ballads addresses a raft of difficult subjects head on – social care, domestic violence, social isolation, austerity, joblessness, systemic racism, illness and disability – it also affirms the transformative power of art.

The show is on view simultaneously at the Serpentine and the Barking Town Hall and Learning Centre in the London Borough of Barking and Dagenham (LBBB), and features four commissions. For the past three years, the artists Sonia Boyce, Helen Cammock, Rory Pilgrim and Ilona Sagar have been working with different communities and organisations in LBBB with the broad idea to explore stories of labour and care, in their many manifestations.

The show features the culmination of those projects, in various media but principally in the form of films and video installations by the four artists and their collaborators. To see it properly, you'll need a good couple of hours, but it's worth that investment – expect to be unsettled, even upset, but ultimately inspired.

Thank you for supporting journalism.

Platinum Cashback Credit Card
Annual fee applies.
Rep. 30.7% APR var.

Apply now

FreeWall® by Rezonance

Thank you for supporting journalism.

Part of the reason the vapid KAWS show grated so much was that the Serpentine has increasingly developed programmes of real social significance and impact recently – it has a curator of general ecology, Lucia Pietroiusti, and Radio Ballads is led by Amal Khalaf, its civic curator. It was her idea to call the show Radio Ballads. The title is partly descriptive of what to expect – especially in the Helen Cammock and Rory Pilgrim films, there is a lot of emotional music. But it also taps into the quietly radical spirit of a series of BBC radio programmes of that name made between 1957 and 1964, in which the folks singers Ewan MacColl and Peggy Seeger worked with the producer Charles Parker on eight programmes that told community stories through song and sound.

Rory Pilgrim, Sketch Book (detail) Pencil and Crayon, 2019 / Courtesy of andriess-eyck galerie

READ MORE

Picasso Ingres: Face to Face, National Gallery - two masterpieces

The best exhibitions to see in Europe in summer 2022

The best free exhibitions in London right now: culture at no cost

SPONSORED
High-end timepieces: the ones to watch

The original Radio Ballads focused on the lived experiences of groups who were rarely reflected in the media of that witness the testimony of people often underrepresented or ignored on mainstream platforms – those who receive different forms of care, and those who give it.

Through New Town Culture, a project in LBBB, the artists were embedded in communities not just to document the situation but to be part of systemic change. Sonia Boyce's film, Yes, I Hear You, and the related digital prints, focus on domestic violence. The video is on four screens hung together in a row. We hear from four people – Amelia, Jasmine, Luke and Michelle – who in different ways relate stories of abuse. The work is clearly collaborative because they each choose their mode of address – Jasmine, facing away from the camera, into a red curtain, tells a story of sisterhood over time with a woman who faced horrific physical abuse from a partner from the age of 15, while Michelle relives a particular disturbing violent incident where her abuser is climbing through a window into her home.

It's tremendously difficult, of course, but also there are messages of hope, solidarity, even advice. We see the four of them with each other, dancing and engaging in what look like trust exercises – literally exercising care.

Helen Cammock, 'Bass Notes and SiteLines The Voice as a Site of Resistance and The Body as a Site of Resilience, 2022 / Production still Rory Pilgrim's film, set in an environment with sculptures by artists he collaborates with, is like a song cycle, performed both in LBBB and in Idaho, US, by poets, musicians and an animator, Catherina Rowland. The songs, with Pilgrim on harp performing with the London Contemporary Orchestra, are often heartbreakingly beautiful, each one taking Pilgrim's title Rafts as a metaphor for care and recovery – "Don't take fires on board," cautions one. In the video, one collaborator, Hugh Prior, leads us to a tree that he describes as having been "torn asunder" in a poem he later reads. The damaged trunk, still supporting living branches, offers "hope for the broken that wander", he says.

Promoted Stories

30 Incredible Makeup Transformations

PLAYS STAR

Sponsored Links by Taboola

Meanwhile, another song accompanies a marvellous animation by Rowland – who talks in the film of “the absolute fantasy... and wonder” of art. And the animation is indeed fantastical, yet also perhaps autobiographical – a journey taken by a figure, beginning on a boat that shapeshifts into multiple forms of transport, before plunging into the ocean, only for the boat – this story’s raft – to bob up and act as a lifeline, and propel the protagonist to an island of their dreams. Tears well up in the figure’s eyes; they did in mine several times during Pilgrim’s film.

Ilona Sagar’s The Body Blow is a two-screen film about asbestos and its horrific effect on the community around Cape Asbestos, a factory in Barking that has led to hundreds of deaths from asbestos-related diseases. With a script written collaboratively by Sagar and London Asbestos Support Awareness Group, the installation is the closest to a documentary in the show, exploring asbestos as a material, its colonial industrial history, the story of the Barking factory and the housing estate that was built in its stead and the diseases and their effects both in terms of health and socially. LBBD has the highest rates of mesothelioma and other asbestos related cancers in London, and Sagar and her collaborators zone in on what it means to care for those who are diagnosed, both in terms of the primary hospital care and offering guidance on the bureaucratic hoops they must jump through. One horrific association is made between scans of ribs of a mesothelioma sufferer and the kind of derelict industrial structure that evokes the insidious fibres that enter the lungs and may lay dormant for years before causing terminal illness.

Sonia Boyce, 'Yes, I Hear You', Production Still, 2021 / Photo: Matthew Ritson.

London Film Quiz

START QUIZ

voters: 3.5K

HPESTER

Breathing is a regular image in Sagar’s project, as it is in Helen Cammock’s video made with, among others, Pause – a group that works with women whose children have been removed from their care. Cammock was perhaps the most natural choice for Radio Ballads: she began her career as a social worker, and her art has long explored oppression, vulnerability and activism. Bass Notes and SiteLines: The Voice as a Site of Resistance and the Body as a Site of Resilience, as the multi-part project is called, features women exploring what care means through movement, drawing and music.

Cammock reads Albert Camus’ quote: “Freedom is never voluntarily given by the oppressor; it must be demanded by the oppressed.” The women discuss the colour of care, finding symbolism in a prism of hues, for instance. They also sing, joyously. “I hurt, I cry, I rise,” they chorus, “and around me always skies. I breathe.” At the end of the film, in voiceover, Cammock reflects on her experience, pondering whether she got to the bottom of her questions. She concludes: “I change where I’m stood.”

See this show; you might say th

Until May 29 (serpentinegallerie;

MORE ABOUT SERPENTINE GALLERIES

Have your say...

Get involved in exciting

VIEW COMMENTS ↓

JERUSALEM

Two Cities One Break

BOOK YOUR TRIP NOW

Book Your Trip to Israel Now!
This is Israel, The Land of Sun, Sea and Sight-Seeing

Sponsored

Award-winning cat and dog insurance

MANYPETS.COM | Sponsored

30 Incredible Makeup Transformations

PLAYS STAR | Sponsored

The Stars of Starship Troopers 23 Years Later

MEGAZINOS | Sponsored

20+ Cool Photos Taken During The Filming Of Star Wars

TOPBUNT | Sponsored

14 Of The Coolest Photos Taken On Earth

EXPLORED PLANET | Sponsored

Blast from the Past 30 Celebrities Hang out with Their Younger Selves

BEACH RAIDER | Sponsored

Fascinating Facts About Lynda Carter's Wonder Woman Outfit

TRAVEL SENT | Sponsored

He Was Once An Icon In The NBA, Here's Him Now

INTERESTICLE | Sponsored

What the latest opinion polls show about the Conservatives and Boris Johnson

EVENING STANDARD

Best cross body bags for women: Style that leaves your hands free

ESBEST

Seasalt Cornwall's new collection will get you summer holiday ready

PROMOTED BY THE EVENING STANDARD | Sponsored

Pics That We Shouldn't Laugh At

DAD PATROL | Sponsored

These Celebrities Turned Heads With Their Red Carpet Looks

REST WOW | Sponsored

Transfer news LIVE! Dybala rejects Arsenal, Tottenham; Bale offers; Jesus, Zinchenko news; Liverpool eye Nunez

EVENING STANDARD

Bon Jovi founding member Alec John Such dies

EVENING STANDARD

The 30 Most Overrated Bands Of All-Time

BLEACHERBREAKER | Sponsored

Click Here

The boos for Boris were the sound of a nation that is finished with him

EVENING STANDARD

MORE FROM ES

What the latest opinion polls show about the Conservatives and Boris Johnson

Duke and Duchess of Cambridge share behind the scenes snaps with young royals from Jubilee weekend

Transfer news LIVE! Dybala rejects Arsenal, Tottenham; Bale offers; Jesus, Zinchenko news; Liverpool eye Nunez

by Taboola

ES.

Newsletters

All Topics

All Authors

Archive

Terms of use

Contact Us

Modern Slavery Act

Syndication

Privacy Notice

Privacy Options

Cookie Policy

Code of conduct and complaints

Advertisers

Promotion Rules

Contributors

Jobs

London Live

The Independent

indy100

Voucher codes

